AS THE CULTURAL AND SOCIAL WORLDS IN WHICH WE ROOT OUR IDENTITIES SPLINTER AND DRIFT APART, OUR IDENTITIES MOVE WITH THEM. The fragmentation of our daily lives has fragmented the communities we live in. In that village a hundred years ago, people would know you across multiple contexts, understanding you as a complex, multifaceted being.

“Our lives are lived piecemeal, not whole,” writes Jonathan R. Wilson. “The disagreements that we have are difficult to resolve because we cannot locate them within some coherent position or community. We do not live in a world filled with competing outlooks; we live in a world that has fallen apart.

Worldviews: from fragmentation to integration

Even more than a pluralistic world we live in fragmented worlds. Like a hand-spun vase shattered into hundreds of pieces, some pieces are jagged and others smooth, some are big while others are simply shards. Our fragmented world is unequal, uneven, and potentially unsafe.

C. Wess Daniels on Plurality 2.0 – Pomomusings

The word, “integration,” can sound abstract, technical, unhelpful. But as I represented it in my first installment on this matter, I take it instead to be the central desire of our lives. We long to integrate life, and to integrate ourselves. I offered as a preliminary definition, that integration i

The tendency of modern life to separate our lives into compartments, combined with a flood of information and pressures to self-create, has given birth to what Kenneth Gergen has labeled the saturated self, 9 a mosaic form of being human. We seek individual autonomy, we worship freedom, yet philosopher Gilles Lipovetsky notes,
